Sarah Bernhardt's Personation of the Melancholy Dane to Be Emulated by an Actress in a Bowery Playhouse - An Adaptation of "Fanst" Rendered in the Yiddish Tongue

Viddish or in the Neapolitan dislect feels or other he can reproduce on the stage the se sordid puritieus there are Hamiets literally translated and "Flamlets" adapted to an almost unrecognizable extent; and, following the example of Sarah Bernhardt, a female Hamlet will soon be seen at the Thalia Theatre.

Not long ago a strange, pathetic character appeared in a sort of Yiddish adapta-tion of "Faust," called "Man, God, and the Bevil." The playwright Jacob Gordin, is the great philosophical Bowers dram-atist, and some of the speeches in this play pass current downtown as being the equal of "To be or not to be" in melanchaly wisdom. The resemblance of this character to Hamlet lies merely in his melanchely and his habit of philosophizmake rhymes, crack lokes, and divert to guests whenever a wedding takes place among the children of Israel. On the stage he is made into a figure half absurd and half divine, is partly crazy and partly inspired. In "Man, God, and the Devil" he is the father of the Jewish Faust, and after his son's meral degradation is beaten and neglected by him. Although sorrow is at his heart he mus always jest and sing his extemporized the tempter of his son, the devil of this Jewelsh Faust. The devil laughs at the badchen's attempt to find a rhyme, and made in God's image, has lived over sixty years, and goes about pointably bunning up toolish rhymes. Wherefore should man he understand more than a simple beast All men go about rhymlug factishty, and after many years the angel of deat) comes and saxs: 'Seck no more rhymes. "You laugh at my thymes," replied the badchen. "When a child has the stem ach ache you give him a plaything, and he stops crying. Do you think the roj stops the pain? No, but the child plays and forgets his pain. My friend, every man has the stomach ache. You are edu cated and so you need big playthings. You need to play with life and death. Other men play with other things; I, for my poor part, play with rhymes. Hat I do it ecause my stomach aches and I wish to because my stomach aches and I wish to forget it.

"You ask me." continued the hard, addressing the devil, "in what I am different from a beast, a beast that has the gift of rhyming. A badchen, Indeed, might be a beast, but a least cannot be a badchen, I will tell you what a hundren is. He is a man with a soul, like other men. He is a lew, and a lew has understanding. You laugh when you want to laugh. All men laugh when you want to laugh and weep when they want to laugh and weep when they want to weep, when I want to weep, when I want so much, to weep, when I want is torn within me, and no one knows why. For in truth to what have I attained in all my life and what is my share in this fine house? And yet I must laugh and laugh and anose the people. I who am sick of the corld, I whose son has been turned from the pions ways of his fathers and has lost his soul through greed, and abuses his old father."

In a following scene he and his grand-daugator comment on the change that has taken place since wealth came to the family through sin.

"People laugh at us," said the girl, "and call us 'newly rich," and father is bad to me and to you."

He grandfather became serious again, is different from that of other fear of him, but with me it is the re-verse. It is I who fear my son; it is I who must crings before him.

"Why do you fear him?" maked the girl, "Are you arraid that he will put you across his knee?"

"Why do you fear him?" asked the gir!
"Are you afraid that he will put you across his knee?"
"I am simply afraid," said the badches."
I would like to stand up before him like a man, but I fear to. In my mouth I repeat rhymes, but all is not well here in my heart. I am a nobody since he became rich. He looks on me with his cold eyes, with which he counts his gold. There is a frost in his look, and a frest in his beart. It seems to me that much money brings down over a man's eyes a deadly frost. Ah child I am an old, ignorant man and can find no piace for myself any more.

Said the gir! "You amount to little now, dear grandfather, and you like to drink your little giass."
"Yes," said the old man downing, "I am now no good, but there was a time there he began to rhyme and swing his body to and fro, esseking in a sing-song when I was great and hounted, when f, the indehen, before the Jews lost their faith, went from home to house at wedding time. Then they all pointed to me, the women all becam to whisper when I entered. There he is, they would say loyfully there is our great hard. Then I would along and they would be quiet as if in a temple and laten to me. My eyes would bear and futther, atrains of poetry came from my tonare. All the people would he deeply moved. I made them laugh and ween at my will. The bride would be covered with tears, and drunken men would become saber a my song, and they who were sober would become drunk. It was a good time, that, a line time. "Why so sed, arandfather, dear?" still the girl. "Let's have a wedding now, for four, elt?"

The eld man fell into the mood, the girl or the fell man fell into the mood, the girl or the fell man fell into the mood, the girl or the fell man fell into the mood, the girl or the fell man fell into the mood, the girl or the fell man fell into the mood, the girl or the fell man fell into the mood, the girl or the fell man fell into the mood, the girl or the fell man fell into the mood, the girl or the fell man fell into the mood, the girl or the fell man fe fun, ch?"

The old man fell into the mood, the gir stood upon a chair and the hadehen as the curtain descended on the scene, sang and danced gayly before her.—The New York Cammercial Advertiser.

American Politics as Viewed in Sister Republice.

(From the Figuro.)

The many who in the journals across the sea has been compared with some demerity to Napoleon presents, after all, nothing which puzzles the analysis or disconcerts with a season of the season presents and the season presents and the season presents and the season presents and the strength of the puzzles the analysis or disconcerts with a passes the somewhat massive solidity of his physical qualities; and this intelligence, clearing his eye, sees through complications in which he most craftly are loost.

champion of the economical doctrine of that party he climbed up all the steps of his political career, and at last reached the summit.

His interesting and brilliant career stands aloof from the habitual uncertainty of political existences. It takes its rigidity as much from the country to which it belongs as from the man himself who, ides it. It presents to us a just but limited mind, accepting in its entirety a political creed and never hesitating to follow it beldly to the letter. It is the methodical exploitation of an idea. It ignores the unforescen and remains identical with itself under whatever forms it may assume.

And here we have a curious specimen of determination and will power. What is the value of that great will power for the United States and for Europe? Events alone can tell. For the present it is suffi-cient for us to recognize and to observe its progress.
